Traditional 17th Century Free House

Located close to bridge 130 of the Grand Union Canal, The Red Lion is a busy free house pub in the heart of the village that takes pride in the quality of the numerous real ales sold each year, serving seven beers each weekend and with festivals every bank holiday selling up to twelve over the course of a weekend.

According to deeds hanging in the pub, dated 1683, it has been a centre point of Marsworth for hundreds of years. There are clues in the structure of the pub suggesting the building itself was standing for many years prior to this. The cruck frame technique, visible at the far end of the pub, paired with the thatched roof, hint at it being constructed as long ago as the Anglo-Saxon period, although the pub hasn't always been as big as it is at present. What we now know as the games area, home to the bar billiards table and dart board used to be two cottages, with one front door and the old fire places still visible today.

With picnic tables to the front of the pub and a large well kept garden with plenty more tables to the rear The Red Lion is a popular destination for all the family after a walk around the nearby reservoirs. Throughout the winter months the wood burning stove and open fire in the public bar keep the warm country atmosphere alive.
